Synopsis (Not for Publication)

"Linda Lou" Heath, orphaned daughter of an old aristocratic Southern family, is loved by David Tennant, an explorer and atavist. Before starting on an expedition into Africa he proposes to Linda and is accepted. They plan to marry on his return.

The day he sails Paul L'Estrange, a soldier of fortune, arrives home. He recognizes his childhood playmate, Linda, at the wharf as she waves a farewell to David.

Paul makes his presence known. There is a jubilant exchange of reminiscences and Paul contrives to see her again in the days to come.

At his uncle's home, where he is unwelcome, Paul learns that an aunt has willed him a small farm in Canada, on condition that he go to live there. But Paul has formulated plans concerning Linda, the farm fitting in with his scheme, and he forces himself upon his uncle's hospitality until things materialize.

Absorbing interest in work and lack of mail carriers make David remiss in his letter writing. Finally, a letter from him announces that he will be home to marry her in less than a month.

Paul is not discouraged; he continues to shower Linda with amorous attentions. In the midst of this comes a cablegram postponing the wedding because of David's return to the African interior. Paul pleads his case even more ardently. In a moment of abandon Linda elopes to Canada with him.

His expedition prematurely ended, David sends a counter cable, but the runner is lost and dies in the jungles without dispatching it.

A year later finds Linda ill in the midst of a bleak Canadian winter. Paul has grown tired of his wife and plans filibustering trip to the South Seas. He sends Jacques Lanair, an adventurer, to tell Linda that he met death by drowning.

The shock leaves Linda in a critical condition. Her child dies at birth. She returns to Louisiana, and marries the internationally-decorated David a few months later, sailing for the South Seas on their honeymoon. They reach a Malay prison island and are entertained by the governor, David's friend.

David wishes to continue his work during his stay, and accompanying the governor to the jungle's edge, Linda recognizes Paul as the leader of a prison main gang. Alone she struggles to keep silent, but an electric storm and the escape of several convicts intensify her terror. She rushes into the jungle to find David and is lost.

Paul, hiding in the jungle with Lamaire, rescues her from death in a swamp. Paul confesses his duplicity and begs her to secure his pardon through her husband. The storm drives David back, and he stumbles upon them as Paul is kissing Linda rapturously because she has consented to help him.

David discredits their stories, but promises to help Paul because of his love for Linda. Paul is taken back to prison to await governmental action.

David secures a pardon for Paul and gives it to Linda to take to Paul. Linda tells David that she will annul the marriage rather than see him suffer disgrace because of her. But as she goes to deliver the pardon, the governor arrives and informs them that Paul had been murdered by Lamaitre, who believed that Paul had betrayed him.

David realizes Linda's innocence and strives to make her forget her misfortunes.
